'Nation' and 'State' in Europe

Anthropological Perspectives

edited by R.D. Grillo

1980, x + 202pp., £9.80 (UK only) / $24.00, 0.12.303060.9

This volume of papers is based on the proceedings of a series of seminars sponsored by the Social Anthropology Committee of the Social Science Research Council. The contributors apply an anthropological perspective to the understanding of some major processes which characterize the "European experience". It is important to consider how the Europe of nation-states was constructed and what terms such as "nation" and "state" mean in practice. Anthropology, by linking macro- and micro-analysis, adds an important dimension to the study of these complex social processes.

The Psychology of Ordinary Explanations of Social Behaviour

edited by Charles Antaki

April 1981, xvi + 338pp., £15.00 (UK only) / $36.00, 0.12.058960.5

The essays in this book fall broadly into two categories — essays on the contribution of experimental social psychology and essays on the contribution of philosophy, anthropology and sociology. Within and across these categories, contributors pursue the arguments for and against, among many other things, the usefulness of introspection; the importance of a cognitive theory of introspection; the importance of a cognitive theory of explanations; the significance of cultural and interpersonal forces on explanations; the possibility of the psychology of explanations being a non-experimental science; and the dangers of the biases and errors to which ordinary explainers and psychologists are liable.

RELIGIOUS ASSORTATIVE MARRIAGE IN THE UNITED STATES

By ROBERT ALAN JOHNSON

A Volume in the STUDIES IN POPULATION Series

This book discusses, and applies to American religious data, parametric models of marital selection between groups—or assortative marriage—in pluralistic societies. The models assume that assortative marriage is influenced by such group factors as relative population size; geographic, socioeconomic, and cultural divisions; and conscious selection. The particular models applied to the religious data, collected from sample survey respondents in the United States, establish social structural uniformities in regional and residential patterns of religious marital selections and significant changes in assortative marriage, including unilateral
